1. I had been educated in the rhythms of the mountain, rhythms in which change was never fundamental, only cyclical. The same sun appeared each morning, swept over the valley and dropped behind the peak. The snows that fell in winter always melted in the spring. Our lives were a cycle—the cycle of the day, the cycle of the seasons—circles of perpetual change that, when complete, meant nothing had changed at all. I believed my family was a part of this immortal pattern, that we were, in some sense, eternal. But eternity belonged only to the mountain.

2. In the beginning of the 1990s, the most famous global brands were the companies that were in the business of producing materials or goods, or processing physical matter. Today, however, the lists of best-recognized global brands are topped with the names such as Google, Facebook, and Microsoft. In fact, in 2007 Google became number one in the world in terms of brand recognition. And, at least in the US, the most widely read newspapers and magazines—New York Times, USA Today, Business Week, etc.—feature daily news and stories about Facebook, Twitter, Apple, Google, and other IT companies.

3. In Korea, phishing scams are becoming more advanced and harder to notice. Criminals are targeting victims through fraudulent investment chat rooms, romance scams, and deceptive e-commerce deals. Scammers use fake text messages, false social media accounts, and pretend to be government workers, companies, or friends. They try to scare people or make them act quickly. Often, they ask for personal information or tell people to click on fake websites or download dangerous apps. These apps can steal important data from phones or computers. To fight back, the Korean government shared a new plan on Thursday. They will add more than 400 police officers to special anti-phishing teams across the country. New teams will work in Seoul, Busan, Gwangju, southern Gyeonggi Province, and South Chungcheong Province.
