1. Louise Bourgeois (1911-2010) never disguised the fact that autobiography was the raw material for her art. Hatred, rage, trauma, jealousy, desire—she cast them in bronze, stitched them in fabric and exorcised them in charcoal and ink over the course of more than seven decades. “It is not an image I am seeking. It’s not an idea. It is an emotion you want to recreate, an emotion of wanting, of giving and of destroying,” she once declared. In her world, mothers became colossal spiders, fathers were devoured at the family dinner table, and children hovered as uneasy witnesses, vulnerable and watchful. Her sculptures are thus a diary in three-dimensional form—a confessional with its doors flung wide.
2. I fully agree with the saying, “The best government is the one that governs the least.” I also wish this principle were put into practice more quickly and systematically. Taken to its logical end, it really means this: “The best government is the one that does not govern at all.” When people are ready for such a system, that is the kind of government they will have. Government, at its best, is only a temporary tool; but most governments are often, and all governments at times, ineffective or harmful.
3. Running is multidimensional: It's freeing yet demanding, energizing yet tiring, fun yet challenging—the list could go on. So in moments of doubt or fatigue during your running journey—whether you're starting a new jogging program after a long hiatus or hitting a plateau during marathon training—inspirational running quotes can provide the motivation and encouragement you need to push through blockers and achieve your goals. Some quotes underscore the importance of mental resilience in overcoming physical limitations, while other phrases aim to reframe your running mindset, fostering gratitude and redirecting focus towards the privilege of participating in the sport. But no matter their theme, these quotes serve as powerful tools for transforming challenges into opportunities for growth and achievement.
